Various factors may influence the outcome of root canal therapy (RCT). This study was conducted to investigate the prevalence of bacterial infection of root canals of maxillary first and second premolar teeth with different aspects of root canal filling. A total of 184 root canals of maxillary first and second premolar teeth were included in the study. Teeth were divided into three groups according to the level of root filling: Group 1, teeth filled with gutta-percha and AH26 sealer only; Group 2, teeth filled with AH26 sealer only; Group 3, teeth filled with hybrid obturation technique. Specimens were assigned into two groups based on the presence or absence of bacterial growth. Prevalence of bacterial infection was significantly greater in the third group, which was filled with a hybrid obturation technique. There were no significant differences between the first and second groups. The prevalence of bacterial infection was significantly greater in the cases with extensive apical periodontitis. Irrigation and shaping procedures performed by a single practitioner may decrease the prevalence of bacterial infection.Q: Error in my code. What am I doing wrong?
